A Wash Sale By H. IRVING KING

PETER HAMPDEN was thirty-five and looked ten years older, for his hair had turned gray, and he had cut out all superfluous things like smoking, golfing and marriage. When barely of age he had been known in the street as "the old young man."

"Correct in his habits?" "Oh, remarkably so." "These things are important," went on Peter, "for when my trusteeship terminates your husband would naturally be the one to look after your business interests. He will find everything in order and that your fortune has considerably increased under his care—what reminds me that the time is fast approaching when, by the terms of your grandfather's will, I must relinquish the supervision of your affairs."

"And you say that my husband would naturally be the one to look after your business?" "Yes, when I give them up," replied Peter. "But I don't want you to give them up."

"What?" asked Peter. "You are too stupid to do anything," cried Candice angrily as she arose and hurried away. Outside of business Peter could not get any more work and he was a remarkably smart nose. Candice's anger put her outburst but she had not intended to do so. As it was Candice's nature to be a bit of a snob, she was not disposed to do any more work and she was a remarkably smart nose. Candice's anger put her outburst but she had not intended to do so.

"What is that with Candice?" asked Peter. "Young Anstruthers," replied Mrs. Randall. "I don't know what she is up to, but she doesn't take him. I think she will choose Calvin George, who is a good match, too. I was beginning to lose a patient because she had been so long. I have begun to have hopes of her."

"Hum-m," said Peter, thoughtfully. Candice in connection with marriage was something new to him—he compared time to assimilate the idea. "That evening as Peter, having pinned his last card at the office, sat in the piazza, was upon the point of convincing him that an imagination of P. Q. & C. with the C. T. & R. would be an excellent and most profitable combination and would not be an anti-trust law. Mrs. Randall came and retrieved her husband with "John, you really must come and speak to the Holbertons over from Glen Court."

"Mentally antagonizing the Holbertons, Peter sat glooming in the piers when there appeared to him a graceful, white-robed figure and an pleasing voice from the direction of the anti-trust law. Mrs. Randall came and retrieved her husband with "John, you really must come and speak to the Holbertons over from Glen Court."

"My dear Candice," replied the man of business, "as your trustee, to give you advice is of course my duty—as well as pleasure and pleasure, I am sure. What is it? Your treatments are—"

"Willie Anstruthers is a very nice young man," ventured Candice. "Humph! Don't fancy him," growled Peter. "And Calvin George is considered a great catch," she went on. "No business ability whatever," said Peter, emphatically. "But of course, if you are really in love with either of these young men—but this is entirely outside of my jurisdiction."

"But suppose," said Candice, "that I wasn't in love with either of them, but with some one else?" "Oh, in that case—what sort of business man is this other?" replied Candice, with a little giggle. "Just ten years older than myself," she said.

"Correct in his habits?" "Oh, remarkably so." "These things are important," went on Peter, "for when my trusteeship terminates your husband would naturally be the one to look after your business interests. He will find everything in order and that your fortune has considerably increased under his care—what reminds me that the time is fast approaching when, by the terms of your grandfather's will, I must relinquish the supervision of your affairs."

Draped Chiffon in Green for Afternoon Wear

By CORINNE LGVÉ

That the hip-subsidy bill has not been unanimously passed is indicated by many late frocks and wraps showing a normal waistline. To this group of smart dresses belongs today's model of draped chiffon draped over a satin slip of matching color. The slip is of course, sleeveless, and the chiffon-leaves are developed from an armhole extending to the depth of the coverage and confined by a tight-out of satin.

The draping of the skirt in contours, permitting glimpses of the satin undergarment, is one of its tricks of the trade. As well as being, the draped skirt parts down the front to give a more satisfactory shimmer of silk. A design of silver threads on the front of the coverage is the only touch of contrast.

By the way, this tint of green known as "celadon" is much used at present by French designers.
